Results-Based Management

To begin, it is essential to clearly define the mission, vision and values of the organization, which in this context is translated into the reason for existence of public security and the purpose of providing a safe environment and contributing to the well-being of citizens and their families.

Adaptability requires the definition of clear objectives and goals, measured and aligned with strategic planning. It is essential that all parties involved participate in the process, including stakeholders.

Results-Based Management

In prospecting based on data analysis, the importance of using correct and valid information to build solid indicators that allow measuring progress in direction of established objectives and goals is highlighted. It is crucial to understand the difference between indicators and goals, where the indicators are tools to adhere to reality and the goals represent future situations to be achieved.

Risk management plays a fundamental role in the search for results. It involves the identification, assessment and control of factors that can negatively affect the achievement of the objectives. Transparency, social participation and a culture of integrity are key elements for accountability and effective governance.

Results-Based Management

In summary, results-based management in public security requires adaptability, accurate data analysis, construction of robust indicators, responsibility and ethics in the use of resources. Public officers, especially in the area of security, play a crucial role in promoting security and building trust in society in public security institutions. Commitment, proactivity and focus on results are fundamental to achieve this objective.
